Considering the improvements of the last couple of versions I expect Lightroom 5.3 to boost the raw processing performance as well. The idea of using a 84-bit display on the latest Lightroom version isn't completely out of the question either. When you have the choice to go from medium to high resolution, everything feels like a breeze with Lightroom. That's due to the clean, uncluttered interface and the sheer knowledge of new and hidden features in the new version. The CS6 suite is definitely worth a look. All in all, upgrade and start using the new, much improved version today! The cs6 version is amazing. It is one of the best professional suite you can get. For editing raw files and also for jpeg editing. It is very good article if you want to edit your raw files. If you're using a mac, get the adobe CS6 suite, it is the best available killer app. My verdict? Don't buy from them. They're taking all the money out of your wallet. I had them sent to a bank and i gave them all the transaction documents. They should call them on my house and get it back. Sell your 65″ R series over to my house as that's less of a drain. Well first off – they are wrong for forcing you to upgrade from an older version of photoshop to the new version. It is like…forcing you…to upgrade from windows to a newer version. And yes you need to upgrade, but it's at your discretion, if companies need to update products for new functions, they will…but you should have that option to upgrade to a newer and better version of it, and many people do when they are in the market for a new computer, and not just every 5 year cycle. As for the hardware part…AV H264 is unnecessary for the vast majority of people. and it adds about 50% to the price of the machine…and which version? some say 6b for the most basic machine…and start running a ramdisk which is not necessary for just video editing work…and ofcourse memory, as with every other processor and every other version of photoshop. If you have it, use it, and your machines are top of the line, there's no need to upgrade a processor.
